Cardiovascular disease is a major leading cause of death in the US and is expected to account for more than 23 million deaths by 2030 according to the recent AHA update. Of those deaths, around one-half million each year will experience arrhythmia-induced sudden cardiac death. Therefore, research on new strategies to target arrhythmogenesis is essential to public health.